The present study critically analyzes the commonplace that the individual bears the burden of proof when it alleges the unjust performance of the Public Administration. The writing begins with the conditions of possibility for the edition of a valid legal act, especially the administrative procedurality and the duty to state reasons. Then, using an interdisciplinary approach, the research seeks to reveal the limitations of exclusively procedural or administrative approaches, showing how the dynamics of the production of the administrative act and its challenge in court have dynamics and assumptions different from those focused exclusively on the traditional explanation of the burden of proof and prerogatives performance of the Public Power. Finally, an itinerary about the judicial cognition of the claim for invalidity of an administrative act is presented, clarifying elements that are minimally necessary for a correct justification of the jurisdictional act. All as a way of contributing to a concrete promotion of access to justice.
