Summary

This article aims to discriminate the elements of the S System, from its form of creation, through the enactment of a law or equivalent normative act, passing through its object, its hybrid legal regime and the discrimination of constitutional services that are not exclusive to the state. Certainly, an outline was made on the constitutive elements of autonomous social services, starting with their legal genesis, the form of creation of the analyzed entities, as well as the legal instruments that can be used for this purpose and their legal organization. The methodology consisted of the analysis of doctrine and jurisprudence, using bibliographic and documentary methods, with emphasis on the sources of the General Theory of Law. It was concluded that the legal conformation of autonomous social services is conferred by the State based on the law that creates the entity.

Regarding the legal regime, it was shown that, in the relationship between them and individuals, the rule is the application of the legal regime of private law and the internal rules of the entity itself. In another turn, as these entities provide services of relevant social interest from the transfer of taxes or public funds through a management contract, they submit to the strict regime of public law in the final control relationship that the State exercises and in the budget rules. It was also evidenced that they perform social services, listed in art. 6 of the Federal Constitution, which are not exclusive to the State. the rule is the application of the legal regime of private law and the internal rules of the entity itself.
