Abstract

In line with the above, we conclude that the State can carry out its activities not only through public agents, but also through individuals participating in public functions or services. Public agents, linked to the State by a political or employment relationship are, respectively, the rulers and the honorifics, or civil servants and public workers. The extra-management staff are also included, called upon, in view of the sudden needs of the administration, to carry out, while the positions are not created, for a transitional period, the activities that must be performed by employed agents. Individuals participating in public functions or services comprise, on the one hand, service providers, whether on demand or voluntary, as contractors or business managers, and, on the other hand, the delegates of public offices or companies, that is, the professionals, unilaterally, provided in the functions, or the concessionaires who agreed to the performance of services. In addition, public agents and, mainly, individuals, participating in public functions or services, rely on the work of assistants, to help them in the performance of their commitments.
